Automotive steel is a type of steel that is used in the automotive industry. It is a low alloy steel that is designed for high strength and good formability. The most common type of automotive steel is low carbon steel, which is used for body panels and structural components. Other types of automotive steel include high strength low alloy (HSLA) steel, which is used for chassis and suspension components, and advanced high strength steel (AHSS), which is used for safety-critical components like crumple zones and seatbelts. The automotive steel market is growing rapidly due to the increasing demand for lighter and stronger vehicles. Posco is a leading manufacturer of automotive steel, and its products are used in a wide range of applications.
